Human-plant scholars have particularly unpacked the role of planty agencies in the context of private gardens, often with ethnographic approaches in which people demonstrate everyday embodied interactions with plants and weeds.

The harmonious idea of people and plants working together to produce gardens can be disrupted when accounting for how weeds can challenge, disrupt and unsettle people's visions and plans for their gardens. Weeding is also a social process, requiring considerable mobilisation and investment of human labour.

A recent post-humanism lens on urban environments has focused on how the vegetal adds new perspectives to the politics of cities and urbanisation. Such lens acknowledges that urban vegetal life is entangled to diverse dimensions of urban governance.

The harmonious idea of people and plants working together to produce gardens can be disrupted when accounting for how weeds can challenge, disrupt and unsettle people's visions and plans for their gardens. Weeding is also a social process, requiring considerable mobilisation and investment of human labour.

A recent post-humanism lens on urban environments has focused on how the vegetal adds new perspectives to the politics of cities and urbanisation. Such lens acknowledges that urban vegetal life is entangled to diverse dimensions of urban governance.

Human-plant scholars have particularly unpacked the role of planty agencies in the context of private gardens, often with ethnographic approaches in which people demonstrate everyday embodied interactions with plants and weeds.

A recent post-humanism lens on urban environments has focused on how the vegetal adds new perspectives to the politics of cities and urbanisation. Such lens acknowledges that urban vegetal life is entangled to diverse dimensions of urban governance.

Human-plant scholars have particularly unpacked the role of planty agencies in the context of private gardens, often with ethnographic approaches in which people demonstrate everyday embodied interactions with plants and weeds.

The harmonious idea of people and plants working together to produce gardens can be disrupted when accounting for how weeds can challenge, disrupt and unsettle people's visions and plans for their gardens. Weeding is also a social process, requiring considerable mobilisation and investment of human labour.